

Vodka

If it will ferment it can potentially become vodka—potato, rye, grains, beets. Vodka means ‘little water’ in Russian, and it’s argued by the Irish Times (August 6, 2005) that by being diminutive voda, its very name infers that Vodka is the refined version of water. The neutral, clear spirit is fresh like water and becomes even cleaner with repeated distillations—it is also said the more distillations, the less intense the hangover in the morning. No wonder the multiple distillation trend is still continuing.

Its pure taste is the perfect base for many cocktails, it also means people revel in infusing Vodka with endless amounts of flavours—some genius, some strange. It was originally made for medical use, then it was elevated after Polish and Russian aristocrats were some of the first commercial distillers, Vodka’s history is embedded in global history; from autocracy to communism.

Gin

Gin is essentially flavoured vodka—but never ever say that to someone who loves the stuff.

To produce gin, a neutral grain spirit is flavoured with a range of botanicals—today, we use pretty much anything, but juniper berries must make an appearance.

The name London Dry today has little to do with London. Instead, it refers to a particular blend of flavours, juniper, a noticeable citrus, and a element of spice (anise, cardamom, coriander, nutmeg, angelica root).

We also associated it with tonic, but without Malaria, that would never would have happened. Essentially, it was discovered that quinine (found in the bark of the cinchona tree), could treat Malaria. What with the British Empire unfurling on the world in their colonial expansion, it was important to get people to actually take the stuff. The answer? Gin! A cheap spirit drunk by the lower classes. And thus, a drink we now associate with a civilised affair was born.

There are also many different styles of tonic, feel free to request your favourite.

Mezcal & Tequila

We think of tequila as something to be shot in the middle of a wild night that will lead to the bad decisions and bad hangovers, but Tequila can be drunk and appreciated like Scotch or Cognac.

All tequila is mezcal, but not all mezcal is tequila. These tasty devils are all made from the indigenous agave plant. Technically, tequila can only be made from one variety of this (the blue agave), and they have to be made in specific regions in Mexico (Jalisco, Guanajuato, Tamaulipas, Nayarit, and Michoacán).

Mezcal can be made in any place, from any type of Agave—and there's over 30.

There are five categories that both Tequila and Mezcal use; Blanco (white or pure), Joven (young), Reposado (aged under a year), Añejo (aged 1-3 years), Extra Añejo (more than 3 years).
